

Watson Census, 1969-2018

As we approached our 50th Anniversary we asked Watson Fellows to share the impact of the Thomas J. Watson Fellowship on their lives. Through an online census we collected data and stories from 1080 fellows.

We learned that for most fellows the Watson was the first time that they embraced the power, and challenge, of building a blueprint for their biggest ideas. And we learned that the confidence and perspective gained from the experience became a renewable resource that inspired their lives and those of many others.

Most telling was that the Watson became the professional foundation for over 75% of fellows -- testament to what happens when purpose and promise fuse on an independent year.

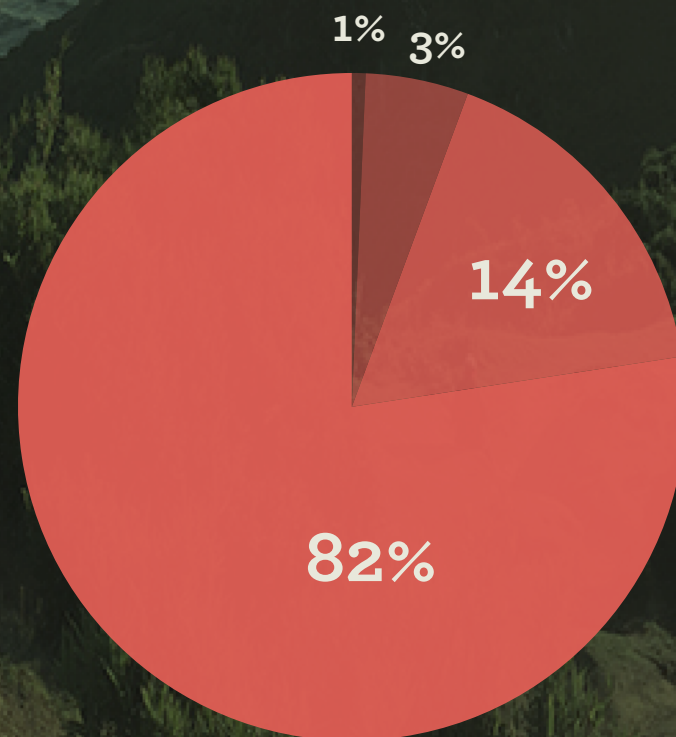

In the following slides:

5 = Definitely Agree, 4= Mostly Agree, 3= Somewhat Agree, 2= Mostly Disagree, 1= Definitely Disagree

“Seven years after I returned from my Fellowship, I founded the School for Field Studies (SFS). To date, SFS has graduated over 20,000 students, so my Watson clearly had far reaching impacts on many lives beyond the substantial value delivered to me.”

*James Elder, 1973 Watson Fellow
President, Campaign for Environmental Literacy*

Mission

96% of fellows definitely or mostly agreed that the Watson experience matched the mission -- “to explore with thoroughness a particular interest, test their aspirations and abilities, view their lives and American society in greater perspective and develop a more informed sense of international concern”.

Project: Cross-cultural Improvisation

“My Watson has shaped every career decision I have made -- to pursue a first job in international development, to join the Foreign Service, and to seek out ways to use music to advance cross cultural understanding in my role as a diplomat.”

Wren Elhai, 2008 Watson Fellow

Foreign Service Officer, U.S. Department of State

Perspective

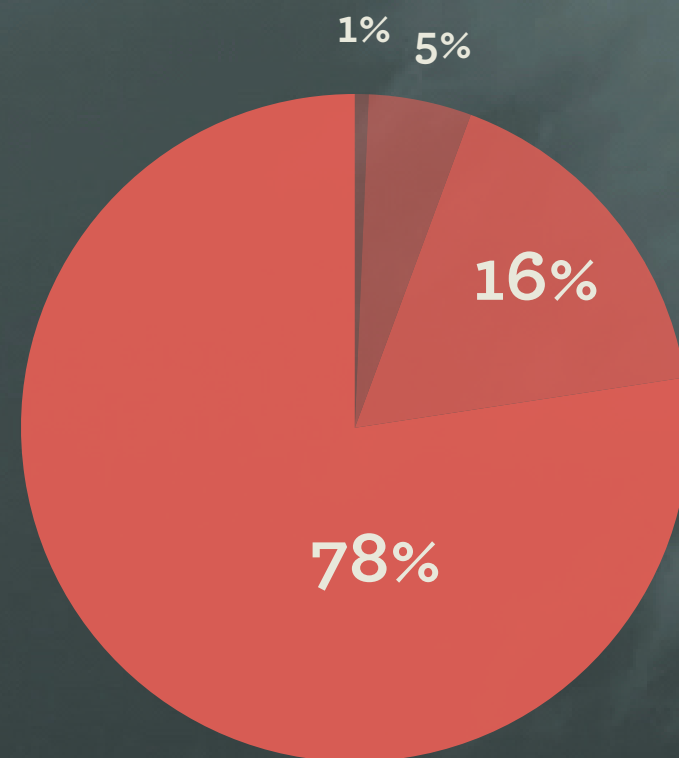

96% of fellows definitely or mostly agreed that the Watson required them to view their lives and American society in greater perspective.

"My Watson gave me a lifetime of courage to confront our most difficult challenges and to work together with others for the common good."

Charlie Collins, 1969 Watson Fellow

President & CEO, YMCA, San Francisco

Confidence

94% of fellows definitely or mostly agreed that the Watson made them more confident to pursue the things that matter most to them.

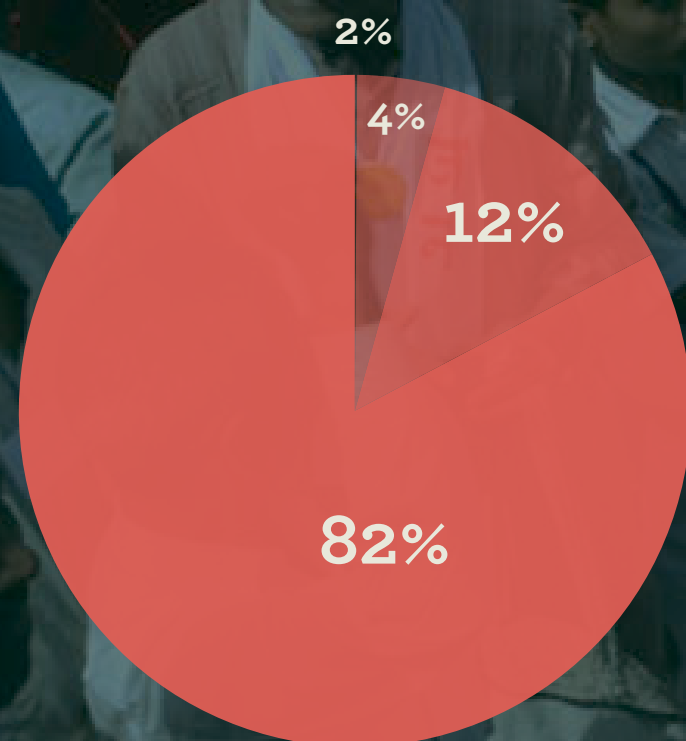

“The Watson Year woke me up, shook me to my core. The stark realities I faced almost forty years ago are still with me as a moral compass and guide which I hold close to my heart every day.”

Margaret Clark, 1978 Watson Fellow

*Executive Director, Aspen Global Health and Development
Vice President, Policy Programs, Aspen Institute*

International Concern

94% of fellows definitely or mostly agreed that the Watson gave them a more informed sense of international concern.

“I felt lucky. And blessed. And saved out of a life without dreaming.”

Garrett Hongo, 1973 Watson Fellow

We look forward to celebrating 50 years of discovery with you and announcing many new projects to inspire the next generation of creative leaders.

“...a constant and lasting reminder that impossible is nothing”.
